Figure 1. A re-drawing of the shape of the Sphinx as it would have appeared in the Old Kingdom, when it was a crouching Anubis. The exact profile and proportions of the Sphinx have been incorporated into the drawing, and the head of Anubis has been added in correct proportion to it. The re-carved head of the Sphinx with a pharaoh's face fits within the neck of what I believe to have been the original whole statue. At right is another re-drawing of the shape of the Sphinx, this time in full face view, and once again, the re-carved head of the Sphinx with a pharaoh's face fits within the neck of the original statue. Observations on Putrid Animal Effluvia, and on the Utility of the Chloride of Lime in Destroying Their Fœtor

It is an opinion entertained by many medical men, that the fœtor of intestinal gases depends upon the presence of sulphuretted hydrogen. Now, though it had not been proven by analysis, that sulphuretted hydrogen is seldom found a constituent of these gases, yet analogy would lead us to conclude that their fœtor depended solely upon the presence of putrid effluvia. For, if a portion of excrementitious matter be mixed with a solution of chloride of lime, the fœtor is instantly destroyed, in the same way as it would be, if the solution were applied to a
